Parliament now decides when Britain goes to war In August 2013 the House of Commons blocked British participation in military action against the Assad regime in Syria The result surprised many observers It should not have done Parliament has grown more assertive on issues of foreign affairs in recent years, particularly those involving major military deployments Successive prime ministers

Justice and Democracy - About

Justice and Democracy constraints, so the argument goes, it is ipso facto unjust: it fails to be justifiable to citizens qua rational and autonomous agents, hence it fails to express equal respect for them Although the constitutionalization of fundamental justice limits the potential damages of democratic decision-making - preventing it from violating basic rights - it is no guarantee

Rebuilding British Democracy

"Rebuilding British Democracy" is the title of our general election manifesto for a very good reason As British voters, we are repeatedly told that we live in an elective democracy; whereas in truth what exists is a sham and an illusion Genuine democracy, where the population's will is given expression by the elected representatives, is starkly absent from Britain Decisions are made by
